Human Message

Congratulations, you have found quite possibly the first zine ever written entirely by cats. They supplied the keystrokes for all copy, and I only provided a few additional services, such as layout, headlines, crossword, and opening cat food cans.

The two creators of this zine are Millie and Buster, now both 14, who are half-siblings sharing the same mom, but Millie's dad is believed to be an older sibling from an earlier litter. Millie and Buster have an uneasy relationship, showing affection by grooming each other or bodily contact sometimes, and violence at other times.

At a young age, Millie loved to sit on keyboards, to the point where we rigged a decoy keyboard for her to sit on while we typed on the other actual one. She adapted her strategy to care less about the keyboard, and more about the action of the hands working on it.

Buster just likes to sleep with his head on the keyboard, and it doesn't matter what's on the screen or what noises the computer is making. He is responsible for most of the copy I've collected.

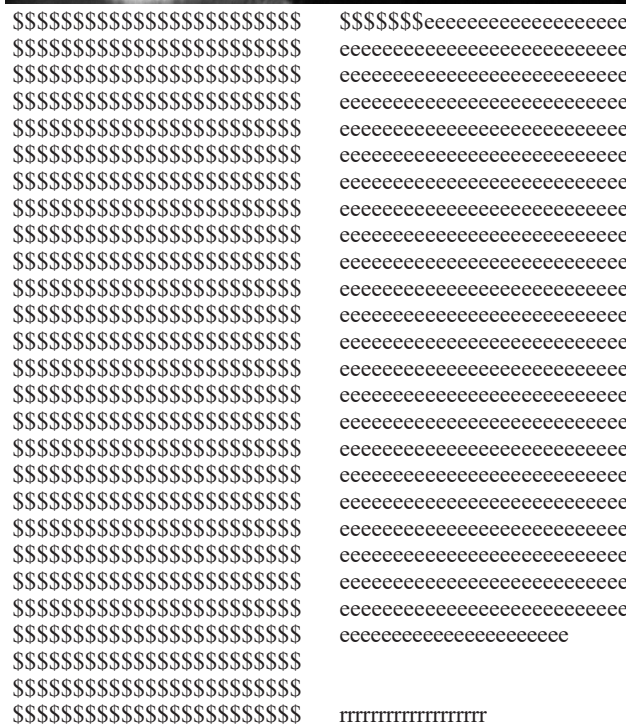

I haven't been saving information on who's responsible for typing what, so I can't offer the authorship of most of this writing. Exceptions include the ice cream one, which really was caused by Millie sitting on the keyboard trying to get to the ice cream I was eating, and the cat fight, which was caused by a cat fight where Millie jumped up on the keyboard to fight Buster and retreated, and then Buster ran across the keyboard after her.

At some point I began collecting their keyboard input in a text file, and a couple times over the years I have printed excerpts in my regular zine, Broke in Korea. But it seemed they deserved their own zine finally.

So enjoy, and share with your own cats, and if they ever do any creative writing on your computer, be sure to save it. You never know — your cat could be trying to communicate with you. They probably just have nothing interesting to say.
